Over the past few decades experimental economics has been involved in testing many traditional neoclassical theories of behaviour. These results have often established systematic departures from predicted behaviour leading to further theory building and subsequent testing of those models, in the process establishing and opening up the general sub-discipline of behavioural economics. Experiments are being increasingly used to inform policy and there has been a clear push for more empirically grounded methods for policy analysis based on randomized control trials. This special issue aims to highlight the richness and diversity on the areas in economics where experimental economics, and more broadly behavioural economic theories can be applied.

Submissions are welcome from young researchers and experts working in the field of behavioural and experimental economics.
